There's no point in hiding the sad fact that the iPad version of Photoshop is not as powerful as the desktop version. The iPad version definitely lacks Undo and Redo, the Round Corner filter and the Artistic Merging tools. To be fair, most mobile users would not need or could not justify the purchase of the iPad version, so these limitations may not be a big issue from the user's perspective. However, it is still a bit difficult to work with, as well as expensive. The iPad version is a great introduction to the desktop version for many; others simply cannot justify the cost of buying it. As the growth of mobile applications continues, users will demand from software vendors full desktop features, as well as performance and power consumption. Having said that, Adobe has already conveyed to its customers that the desktop application still remains the main Photoshop tool for the foreseeable future. At this point, the only thing that I find missing from Photoshop is the ability to edit a selection with Object Selector and then use it as a smart object. This way, you could either drag the image, which would make it fit the size, or use Actinic Edit mode and set the size as you wish. I wonder if it is possible to have a Layer Mask for the "Grouped" layer to hide the image while you work on it (and still see the image on the Grouped layer). Anyway, as I have stated, all the tools and features that are useful on the desktop are found on the iPad version. Like other services and apps that let you do mobile sharing, you can choose to either share your selection or anything under it or anything in it. You can even share with Groups, which is where it gets interesting. You can choose to share only with the current Group, send it to your personal Groups, or the entire Group which should work pretty well if your other mobile devices are members of the same network and have data connection.
