Once again, I suppose it comes down to the user experience. I was just starting to feel a bit comfortable using these tools when I noticed that all reviews were locked to my account. I am glad that is not the case, but it begs a question: Can all reviews be accessed and read by everyone in a Creative Cloud customer organization? I believe that all reviews for a shared file should be accessible to everybody within the organization. Also, if the reviews were stored locally on the computer, I can imagine a scenario where two people could see each other's comments. For example, if you are a designer who is working with stakeholders in an agency, and you are not able to incorporate their feedback into the current design until they approve the files, you would not want to be not be able to add this feedback and ask them to review your files later, if you wanted to change anything. If it is not a one-time event, a designer would be able to ask the stakeholders over multiple design experiences to provide feedback and then document all of those endeavors in the form of reviews.
