Developers like to point to web browsers as their main competition with Photoshop, but the full-featured Photoshop matches their power, native and web standards, and accessibility. Fast, native performance, reliable rendering and robust, 64-bit architectural support from the GPU engine, and standard deep learning layers in Adobe's Creative Cloud subscription that make incredible digital painting and filmmaking tools available today. In the future, you can expect the same robustness with the new APIs, when they're fully available. For now, let's explore how the modern web is driving innovation. When your images are riding around in the web browser, they're not just being accessed in another format. Your viewer is involved in serving the image. Sometimes they're even the image context. For example, if you're using CSS, you can't guarantee that the image is displayed at the same size on the screen as it is in the format you're serving it to the web browser, so image scaling and cropping happens in the browser, and that means the image might be displayed in a different size, or on retina screens, and so on. This is where modern web browsers go to work by using powerful hardware acceleration, and by being able to identify the image context and scale and crop images in the browser while you're working in Photoshop, so that you can just work in the web browser when you're looking for it, and the rich digital layers and effects you're looking to add will still look just as good.
