The etiology of ovarian cancer is still not completely understood. The cellular and molecular changes in the ovaries that lead to carcinogenesis are poorly defined. However, evidence from epidemiologic studies and in vitro studies suggests that estrogen, prolactin and insulin-like growth factor (IGF-I) may play a role in the development of ovarian cancer. Some studies have shown that germline mutations in BRCA1 and BRCA2 genes predispose to ovarian cancer. Genes of the Wnt pathway are also frequently mutated in sporadic epithelial ovarian cancers. The recently developed techniques for molecular analysis of ovarian cancers have enabled the identification of a number of new genes implicated in ovarian cancer. As the relationship between mutations and ovarian cancer development is poorly understood, it is essential to determine whether germline mutations in specific genes predispose to ovarian cancer development. This can be achieved by screening the same gene in both patients and controls and by analyzing large cohort of patients and controls. This review summarizes the current knowledge of the role of mutations in the pathogenesis of ovarian cancer and points out the possibilities for future research in this area. "Washington, D.C."
